The last thing I watched on Netflix was a documentary called The War on Crime, and I have to say I was pleasantly surprised. In a world of superheroes and God-like beings, learning about the humblest of soldiers can prove to be a source of inspiration. Space travel could be easier than what we think thanks to a tiny rover that could land on distant planets and explore them. Bypassing earth bound controls: The satellite could land on a comet and take a ride to another planet. Bypassing earth bound controls: The satellite could land on a comet and take a ride to another planet. (NASA Ames Research Center) A satellite-mounted robotic rover that could land on and collect samples from asteroids or comets is under development at NASA's Ames Research Center in Mountain View, Calif. The satellite, called a gravity tractor, could land on a comet and take a ride to another planet. For example, it could hitch a ride on comet Siding Spring on a flight path to the moon. The rover, a small, boulder-sized box, would have a small arm at one end that would be used to grab and manipulate an object. It would have a camera, a communication system, and a system to find its location. The Gravity Tractor, a small, boulder-sized box, could land on a comet and take a ride to another planet.
