(MSFT) In the development of computer science, there were many milestones, but in 1973 a new academic field was born: bioinformatics. Bioinformatics at first only slowly started to turn, but as time progressed it rapidly increased to become a promising scientific area. Finding the path through the success of bioinformatics is a difficult task, since he first has to determine his goals, before taking the first steps. Goal definition The most important goal of bioinformatics is to gain insights into the molecular processes which occur in the human body. One has to get to know the reasons behind a disease, for example, cancer, and find ways to treat it. For this reason, the area's development has been more influenced by biological and medical research than technical development. For this reason, bioinformatics may even be defined as "the science which finds ways to discover the biological function of genes, cells and organisms," (Sander, 2005, p. 1). Bioinformatics is not only understood as the scientific study of biological information and structures, but also as the interpretation of biological information and structures and the inference of the underlying mechanisms of biological systems. (Sander, 2005, p. 2) This twofold definition makes it clear, that bioinformatics is not only limited to the field of (bio)chemistry, but also includes fields, such as computer science, biology, and medicine. The research and development of bioinformatics is divided into three fields: data science, biology, and information science. (Sander, 2005, p. 2) The data science field is responsible for the collection, storage, and organisation of data. A biologist is responsible for the biology and the interpretation of data. An information scientist is responsible for the knowledge creation. The combination of these three fields is what allows scientists to make any kind of biological or medical research possible. The bioinformatics research is "the study of biological data which enables effective exploitation of the information and knowledge in biological, medical, and other health data and biological and health information.
