I'm going to post a number of articles on this blog that have not been published elsewhere. I've already posted some at my blog by the same name, but they don't seem to have stirred much. The SNS from the Fairbairn article was one of the few that was synthesized in my lab and it was one of the few that clearly broke the rules (I had to wait for the results to see what had happened). Since we've met people who strongly object to synthetic biology, I want to make the case for it, especially if I can make people understand why it might be the future of medicine. Synthetic Biology isn't all black and white, but synthetic biology can be a tool for good or evil. I could become an expert in testing a drug or surgical procedure. If I'm designing a pump, I can design it so it works for the patient. My husband, who doesn't suffer from hay fever, could get a pill that knocks him out for an hour. I can get implants for my teeth. I can choose my parents' or my children's genes to avoid future diseases. On the other hand, we can create better criminals. We can create weapons to kill people in war zones. We can build machines that wipe out a whole city
