An epidemic of acute promyelocytic leukemia, characterized by the abrupt onset of severe bleeding symptoms, was observed in the southwestern part of Japan from October 1981 to March 1982. We retrospectively investigated clinical features of patients with this disease from 5 hospitals in the region. In this epidemic period, there were 50 consecutive patients with acute promyelocytic leukemia. Fifty-seven out of 829 patients with acute myeloid leukemia were diagnosed as having acute promyelocytic leukemia during the same period. Clinical features of these patients were as follows; 1) all patients were male. In all 50 patients, abnormal blasts were detected in the peripheral blood. In 35 patients, the marrow was hypercellular with prominent myeloid cell proliferation. The median age was 22 years (range, 3 to 68 years). 2) The median age of patients with acute promyelocytic leukemia was 28 years, younger than that of patients with other types of acute myeloid leukemia. 3) Abnormal promyelocytes in the peripheral blood and marrow were accompanied by numerous megakaryocytes in bone marrow aspiration. 5) Most patients presented with atypical bleeding symptoms. Blood counts in most patients were within normal limits. However, blasts in the peripheral blood were high in 4 patients. Cytochemical stainings of these blasts demonstrated a slightly positive reaction for acid phosphatase. 4) Most patients showed abnormal karyotypes, with loss of chromosomes 5 or 7. Treatment with cytosine arabinoside had been undertaken in 20 patients with acute promyel
