Fleeing a violent ex could appear ominous for any new relationship, but it may have been even more challenging in the pre-electricity and "carriages-only" era. Those living in rural communities at the time had to rely on horses to get around. Transportation was a huge issue for people, which led to increasing tension between husbands and wives, and between parents and their children. It was therefore important for the family to follow strict rules of etiquette to avoid any disagreements with their neighbours. As a result, flight from a spouse was seen as a major betrayal in these communities, which were dominated by the local church. The rules state: If any woman should be given in marriage, she ought to be betrothed to her husband for at least seven years before he shall have a lawful wife, saving women from the vice of bigamy, and those, who can make up their minds to marry again, to have no right to be put out of the estate of their husbands. (Household management, 1601) In addition, marital relationships were judged on the basis of the wife's honour, with adultery punishable by stoning and subsequent death (1). In order to protect the family's honour, women were expected to stay away from any men who weren't family members. The seventeenth-century Letters of a Married Woman (2) reveals that it was common practice for women to negotiate a way of escape from a relationship that was violent or in which they weren't happy. Such flight didn't always go smoothly, as this representative example reveals: In the fourth week of April I went to y'r fatherlande (his own country) to goe and see my wedding. But y'r father, with the consent of every frend (and y'r frende's frends) that he had, or with the consent of God, seduced me to goe againe with him; for, by the wyse, and deathe, of my frends who had given him consent. I was even forced to say, that I was made wylde (wild) for him. This day came one who had heard that I was taken againe by my father, to a place where you [you] were not, and to a people that we knew not; and so, having in my hands the names of all his frends and relations, I went to my frendes in F

Q: how to get multiple rows in JSP using for statement I am having a multiple row data displayed in a table in JSP. I am trying to loop this data so that my records can be displayed in a table. The data is in a single column (JSON String) My code: "); } } %> Its giving me the following output: Key Value Key 1 Key 2 Key 3 Key 4 But I want to get the following output: Key Value Key 2 Key 3 Key 4 How to get this? A: Your code in your question is telling you to iterate over the keys of your map, outputting each key, and then print the value for each key you encounter. This is not what you want to do. What you want to do is print out a table. Try printing out a table using this loop: for (TableRow row : myTable.getRows()) { for (TableCell cell : row.getCells()) { out.print(cell.getValue()); } out.println(); }
