The final plan is currently up for debate with a spring vote planned in the City of Ottawa. The draft which had already been introduced last month had a stronger focus on sustainability than the final one. The plan includes 18 changes, ranging from completely new routes to changes to bus stop lighting and time of day of service. It will replace Ottawa's existing 'Good Growth' plan which was published in 2012. The 'Ottawa Good Growth' plan used census data to determine which neighbourhoods had the highest and lowest levels of population growth. For example, the report found neighbourhoods in the city's south end had the lowest levels of population growth. The new plan will have an updated model for determining the priorities for new transit routes in order to bring a more gender, racial and income-based perspective to transit planning. These are just a few of the changes set to be made, according to the city: New stops and service on 22 street routes in Ottawa. Services will be added to two routes on a Friday schedule to encourage travel to and from employment centres. Eight new routes with 12 new stops will be added to the city's north side. A new route with three new stops is proposed for the city's north end. Service will be increased on two routes with four new stops. Four bus routes and seven stations will be added to the Trillium Line between the Ottawa Hospital and downtown. New parking in the Lansdowne Park area will be restricted. A new service will be added at Bayview Station in Barrhaven. New service will be added on the Tapp route at Lansdowne. A new transit priority for low-income and youth will be added to the north Ottawa section of the Transitway. Delays will be reduced on the Transitway. Downtown bus service along Bank Street will be added. Traffic along Bank Street will be improved to make way for transit.
